RADON TESTING

Radon Testing of Homes

The guideline "Action Level" of 800 Bq/m³ (20 pCi/l) was adopted in 1988. In 2006, Canada's Federal Provincial Territorial Radiation Protection Committee (FPTRPC) recommended a revised guideline with a lower action level of 200 Bq/m³, which was adopted by Health Canada.

Test Protocol

Testing for radon in homes can be carried out by the homeowner using a long-term monitor, such as an alpha-track type radon detector. Long-term electret sensors are also acceptable. At least one (1) monitor should be placed in the main living area of the home (not the basement) at about 4' to 7' above the ground. It should be left there for a minimum of three (3) heating months and preferably for a six (6) to twelve (12) month period. The monitor is then returned to the supplier who provides the results to the customer. A current list of some suppliers of these devices and their approximate cost is on the attached page.

Other types of radon detectors, such as charcoal canisters and electronic "sniffer" devices, are available but not recommended for evaluating radon in homes since they give a short-term reading (e.g. three (3) days) rather than a long-term (integrated) measurement of the average radon level. If such tests are carried out, owners need to be aware of the uncertainties in the interpretation of any results.
